WHAT WEALTHY CANNOT BUY.

Millions of people in this world yearn every day for the possession of wealth. Some of them would have you believe they are willing to sell their very souls for the possession of money in large quantities; some, alas, do sell their souls. And, after all, in a great number of instances, wealth is a mockery. "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" asked the Savior.

The recent death of Charles F. Yerkes, many times a millionaire, is a case in point. Yerkes possessed wealth beyond the wildest dreams of avarice. Anything that money could buy he could have. Cost long since ceased to be a consideration with him. Yet when this man's time came to die, the summons found him on the bed in a hotel, attended by a hired nurse.

He could have bought and paid for a thousand average American homes without denying himself a single luxury. He could not buy the smallest fraction of the wealth of happiness that is an every day feature of the average American home. He could not buy the love of his wife; he could not buy the solace of tender ministrations on his deathbed. True he could and he did buy attention, but between attention that is given for money and attention that is given for love a great gulf is fixed.

Thousands upon thousands of men who never dreamed of possessing a hundredth part of Yerkes' wealth thousands who never knew what it meant to be sure from month to month that the next month would find abundance in the home, have passed from earth under far more beautiful surroundings than those of Yerkes, dying on a bed in a garishly furnished hotel room.

Instances like these are calculated to make those of us who are without worldly wealth, the affection of those around us, feel that wealth, however desirable, is not the sine qua non of human existence. Solomon never gave us a wiser utterance than when he said:

"Better is a dinner of herbs where love is than a stalled ox and hatred therewith."—Solt Lake Herald

An Iowa girl has sued her sweetheart for $10,000 damages for taking her driving behind a fiery team. Naturally, she objected to having her lover use both hands in managing the horses. Hope she gets a verdict.

A western college student has gone insane over a scheme to make John D. Rockefeller work for a living. But Mr. Rockefeller did work for a living, and got it—likewise the living of a good many other men.
